Silver Spring, MD – "I'm a Printmaker!" confesses Edward McCluney in the first line of his exhibition statement, and one can't disagree. In this mini-solo exhibition, McCluney packs a range of printmaking techniques—linocut, woodcut, silkscreen, and intaglio are all represented here. The prints included range from older favorites to newer works created just this year.

Edward McCluney has been teaching and creating artwork for most of his professional life. He has been a university professor for over 30 years, most recently at MIT. He has exhibited extensively across the country, including solo exhibitions National Center for Afro-American Artists in Boston, MA; the Harvard University Print Gallery in Cambridge, MA; and the Roten Gallery in Baltimore, MD, to name a few. He is also in the permanent collection of the National Center for Afro-American Artists, Harvard University, and private collections nation-wide.
